

Make no mistake about it—These seniors take time out for a memorable photo after upholding the tradition of being victorious over the juniors in the powderpuff game. Decorating faces was one method of intimidating the juniors. Apparently it was successful.

The Last of Everything

Close to the end, yet only the beginning

When you start high school as a freshman, it is a scary, new experience: new teachers, a new building and a bunch of new people. As you get used to things, it's really not scary at all. You get used to the building and meet new people. Every year we lose a class, yet also gain another one. As an underclassman, I think we all look up to the graduating class, knowing someday we will be in their place, ready to move into the "real world."

What happens when you're finally a senior? Well, you are at the top again, leading the way, setting an example for the classes yet to come. Your senior year is the year of "lasts." When you went to Homecoming, did you ever think, "This is my last Homecoming"? What about your sport? Have you ever thought, "This is the last season I'll ever play in high school"? No matter if you've thought about it or not, every day you may do something you may never have the chance to do again. One day, which will come very soon, you will walk into school and perform your daily routine one last time. The last time you will walk through the doors as a DHS student, the last time you will go to your classes, your last lunch at school, the last time you will enter your combination into your locker and, finally, the last time the bell will ring to dismiss you from school for the day.

Everyone says high school constitutes the best four years of your life and for most people, that's true. You realize who your true friends are and really get to know your classmates. You form relationships with the staff members and begin to feel right at home. Then you're off to college, to start the whole process over again.

• Talia Beery

Jennifer Beach
Mellissa Beckwith
Marvin Beland
Nicole Belknap

David Bellmore
Chenaya Bennett
Sara Bishop
Jill Black